Section AAnswer Question 01.

Extract A

Bismarck had no fear of the Reichstag and was right not to have any. Even though after 1871 the Reichstag developed a certain momentum of its own which he had not anticipated, this was merely inconvenient to him. In the last resort, if all else failed, Bismarck relied on the electorate to support him if he had to dissolve an obstructive Reichstag. Bismarck had created a Reichstag elected by equal suffrage not in order to introduce parliamentary government, but to control it. He held the political parties in contempt and regarded them at best as groups to be manipulated and controlled. In practice, the Reichstag and therefore the parties, participated in legislation but had no control over the government.

Any proposed piece of legislation had to have the consent of the Reichstag before it could be enacted. Bismarck took considerable notice of political parties: after all majorities depended on them. Although the Chancellor was not responsible to the Reichstag he was still subject to its control and had publicly to give account of his actions. The Reichstag's right to discuss the budget was extensively used and it was the Chancellor's duty to be present and to try to justify his actions. The Chancellor needed his majorities, and if he could no longer provide them he was of no use to the Kaiser. One of the reasons for Bismarck's fall is that, in 1890, he suffered a heavy electoral defeat.
