Section AAnswer Question 01.

Source A

From a treatise by Gerald of Wales, written c1190. Gerald worked as a clerk for Henry II but the King denied him his wish to become Bishop of St David's.

Such had been the unpredictable character of King Henry, that he provoked and encouraged quarrels between his sons, hoping from their discord to gain peace and quiet. But Geoffrey had so attached himself to the minds of King Philip and the nobles of France, that he was created seneschal of France. Geoffrey was raised to a great power and admitted with great familiarity to King Philip. Geoffrey so incited both the King of France and the whole of that realm generally, against his father and his brother, by his persuasive words, that, if he had not been prevented by death, he would have raised against them such trouble as they had never before experienced.

Source B

From 'Deeds of Philip Augustus' by Rigord, writing c1200. Rigord was a French historian and monk, based at the Royal Abbey of St Denis.

Philip sought to take Gisors castle from Henry II, which had been handed over as dowry for Margaret, at the time of her marriage to Young Henry, on condition that it should devolve to any offspring from the union. But if Margaret did not have any children, the dowry would revert without argument to the French King on Young Henry's death. Henry II had frequently been summoned to the French court concerning these matters, but always raised false delays and put off standing to judgement. When the most Christian King Philip saw these cunning tricks and dodges, he shrewdly realised how damaging delay would be and he decided to enter the lands of the King of England with an army.
